An Avian Macrophage Macropinocytosis Pathway Contributes to Escherichia coli Killing. Macropinocytosis allows for uptake of extracellular fluids containing antigens, which can present to the immune system. Macropinosomes are transient acidic structures formed during fluid uptake, which are modified by signal proteins to support macropinocytic actin remodeling and subsequent immune signaling. We utilized avian macrophages, which lack the binding C-type lectin receptor Dectin-1, to study the role of macropinocytosis in immune signaling. We used live and fixed imaging approaches to visualize macropinocytosis in chicken macrophage cell lines and primary cells, and we quantified macropinocytic uptake of E. coli. In macrophages, bacterial uptake was a temporary event, and macrophages per se produced a transient macropinocytic internalization pathway (TRP). E. coli induced TRP in 8-10% of cells. To determine how the pathogen induces macropinocytosis, we incubated macrophages with a panel of E. coli strains that differ in their ability to induce TLR2 signaling and phagosomal acidification. E. coli that signal via TLR2, but not those that use FimH, induced TRP. Furthermore, E. coli that induced TRP were internalized via TRP. Peritoneal macrophages formed TRP in response to E. coli and subsequently phagocytosed bacteria. Thus, TRP contributes to the macrophage ability to kill bacteria. These results are the first to show that bacterial recognition by TLR2 can lead to macropinocytosis.
