I've been working on a very bare bones solr appliance using opencode's chef cookbook. I've managed to get it working quite nicely, but there's a couple of things that I feel I can't do due to limitations in the cookbook, and I'm wondering if any of you have found another cookbook that might be better suited. My major issues are: running slapd, postgresql and mysql, which prevent me from using 'apt' running a webserver, so that I can use the hosts section to configure the hostname. This is so that I can use a vagrant file to provision the appliance. I've had to use a script to load the json templates. This isn't ideal because it's not very configurable, and I think it also means that I've written it so that I need to remember to put it into all sorts of random places I need to do a local mirror of the index using the 'cop' task. It feels kind of hacky to have to generate the file, download it and run it. There's some more, but I feel like that's probably enough for now! A: I have recently deployed Solr, ZooKeeper and a Virtio block device on Debian and Ubuntu with a Vagrant file using Chef. Here is the Vagrant file. You should be able 3da54e8ca3
