pioneering research on the populations of Timor, have died of age-related illnesses in the last month, aged 76 and 72 respectively. Mr Plumpton, who died at the University of Queensland's eye hospital on 28 February, was renowned for his work in measuring the diversity and abundance of species across the island's mountains and southern forests. Mr Plumpton's brother, David, died in Sydney two months ago. Allan Plumpton died at the hospital he first worked at, in Timor, 21 years ago. Mr Plumpton was the first scientist to measure the number of protected plants and animals on Timor, and his data provided the basis for a management plan that was adopted by the Australian and East Timor governments in the early 1990s.
