Blot newspaper. The infamous genius, the conspiratorial painter, the accursed writer Fyodor Mikhailovich Dostoevsky, wandered for two days through the streets of Moscow. He has come to St. Petersburg. He did not look at the things around him. Did not notice the people and the things. He looked at his feet, and only feet. He was confused. His mind was filled with voices, and his head with darkness and a vivid sense of danger. Then he entered a funeral. An accident killed a visitor in a middle-class house. All have come to pay their condolences to the hostess. The dead man is the father of the house, a lawyer. And suddenly the voices began to speak. He understood nothing. He shuddered as it did that with him; his skin turned cold, and there was pain in his heart and liver. He looked at the people around him. He saw red, wrinkled faces of old women, glazed eyes of middle-class people. But the young man was most noticeable. He was a host for a funeral, and because of his young age, he looked like an angel. It was as if he stood under a blizzard. Over time, Dostoevsky started to analyze the young man. He took him out of the room. He didn't go upstairs. He didn't go to the attic. This was because he had heard something in the attic. He led him to an empty room. "Tell me, you and I know very well who is the murderer of the lawyer. And I will tell you why." Dostoevsky smiled for the first time. "The reason is, there's no murderer," he said, then added, "But if there were a murderer, I would have noticed him." Dostoevsky felt a strong desire to return home. He wanted to stop playing this game. He wanted to quickly finish it and rush to the police. But he was afraid. He was afraid of himself. "So, will I stop?" "And what's the name of your publisher? Porfiry Petrov
