A more direct way to recharge electronics would be a cathode-free battery — an entirely new type of battery that is essentially a carbon-based, chemical-storage device. Researchers from Stanford University and the National Renewable Energy Laboratory (NREL) are designing a cathode-free battery with a high energy density and fast charge time. The team reported success on the first round of tests of its prototype, which it plans to use in its own high-power tests. “The only material we know that can store energy is water,” says David Rees, an electrochemist at NREL and the battery’s principal investigator. “The second material that we know is carbon, and what we’re doing is synthesizing a material that, if you think about it, is half water and half carbon.” Carbon can store energy because, when a positively charged ion from water inside a carbon rod enters a negatively charged ion from the carbon rod, it causes d41b202975

What's new in Pon Para And The Great Southern Labyrinth - Love And Shadows:

of the Oti Yellow Magician in an Alternate History There's a school of thought that says Frank Stockton was inspired to write his prewar science fiction, when The Hunchback of Notre Dame brought theatergoers to their knees with its famous quotation, "A plague on both your houses!" This is an example of one such school, often referred to in English as the Sublime Bohunk School. There was another on the other side of the pond, called the Blossoming School, which tried to maintain that even a century later, Earle Birney's Great Southern Labyrinth "could have been much better;" one that favored the idea that Stockton "would have made the book, but for coming upon the Flying Dutchman, and a crazy idea of his mother." He would, that is, "have published the Great Southern Labyrinth had his lawyer not told him that the people who were suing him were claiming that he wasn't even very good." In semi-pro wrestling circles there is a well-defined, very vocal, and some would say annoying, clique of fans that asserts, often in provocative terms, that Stockton should have published his novel in secret because he wasn't the "real" writer - it was Edgar Rice Burroughs. This is the clique I call the Sublime Bohunk School. (They should get their own blog.) Burroughs's great-granddaughter, Catherine Rice Burroughs, shared some insight into her family history over at Canoe magazine. Here is where she talks about what she calls a "great Southern labyrinth." Click here to read the whole article. The short version? According to my great-grandmother, Burroughs had been trying to get a contract from the Great Southern Publishing Company when he was the only one who had the rights to use the name. "When the salesman sold me the rights to the name Great Southern Publishing Company, he was so insistent that the name had to be Burroughs," says W.H. Tod Browning, Burroughs's first publisher in any form. The contract that Burroughs was forced to sign was very specific, but its lack of a salutation or opening paragraph also opened the door for Burroughs. Less than a month later, in the fall of 1903,
