Autoimmune disease occurs when genes encode for components that cause the self-reactive immune system to attack the host. It is thought to be reduced by gene therapy in which the pathogenic genes are replaced by nonpathogenic ones to revert immune processes. We now describe a simple form of gene therapy-inducing tolerance to DNA by tolerogenic cells genetically engineered to express soluble Fas ligand (sFasL). Tolerance induction was specific for DNA, required an intact thymus, and induced lymphoproliferation in vivo after transfer of tolerant cells into irradiated recipients. Transfer of tolerogenic cells with nontransgenic, nontolerogenic cells induced potent lupus in recipients, which could be dramatically reduced by gene therapy with tolerogenic cells and simultaneously transferred with sFasL. Thus, it is a genetically tractable form of tolerance that can be used in different contexts to induce specific immune tolerance to antigens, including DNA.02/06/2016 - 02/06/2016 Matias González (BRA) The Nantes Story Matias González is the most famous character in the history of French football.
