Three-dimensional (3-D) visualization of developing mossy fiber sprouts in the rat hippocampus was investigated by correlative light and electron microscopy, using cryo-sections of semithin epoxy-embedded ultrathin sections. Mossy fiber sprouts were detected by 2-D visualization of serial semi-thin epoxy sections and reconstructed 3-D images. The mossy fiber sprout growth was analyzed using the time lapse imaging system. Mossy fiber sprout growth was found to be correlated with the earliest hippocampus formation, which can be divided into three stages: formation of the marginal zone (MZ), the subventricular zone (SVZ) and the dentate gyrus. The growth of the sprouts through the SVZ into the hilus region was found to be continuous in 3-D images, in which the volume of the sprouts and the density of branching points seemed to be constant. In the 3-D images of the sprouts that were in the MZ and SVZ, the sprouts formed a thick bundle at the border between the SVZ and MZ, and connected the SVZ with the MZ. The
